PAINTED INDIAN APPEARS IN DREAMS OF SEGEE, WHO IS PART INDIAN

THE RED RIDER MADE HIM DO IT

When the urge struck him, Segee set fire to anything—a store and a pier in Maine, a New Hampshire schoolhouse, a Salvation Army center. All the fires were brought on, said Segee, by the weirdest and most recurrent of his dreams—a flaming red rider on a fiery red horse. Sometimes the rider was dressed like an Indian (above). Sometimes the horse appeared without a rider (below). Each time he started a fire, it was the rider who made him do it. Sometimes the rider returned to chase him from the scene. It was this quirk of the rider that saved Segee from detection. Most arsonists are caught as they excitedly stay around to see the destruction they cause.
